De tabletcomputer wordt sneller geaccepteerd door de consument dan welke computer of telefoon dan ook. Volgens een onderzoek van Morgan Stanley wordt 2011 het tabletjaar. Bedrijven en consumenten storten zich gretig op de toepassingen.

At the end of the day, Uncle Sam has no backstop for his backstop. His green pieces of paper say, "In God We Trust." None say, "In Sam We Trust." And this is for a good reason. Uncle Sam can't extract manna from heaven. Yes, he can go after our kids and grandkids and make them share our losses, but there are also limits to this expropriation—limits, as we'll see, we've already reached.

The one real advantage the government has in insuring macroeconomic performance is in coordinating the economy's choice of equilibria—or, in noneconomic speak, in keeping us psyched up. The president, in particular, is in a unique position to play the economic cheerleader—to get us all thinking positively and acting upon our good vibes. But pep rallies can go only so far and be held so often. There is, in fact, no assurance that the government's financial guarantees, which are stated in dollars but are meant to be real, can actually be fulfilled.

Trust Doesn't Come Cheap

The financial panic has abated, but could quickly return, given that the public has seen nothing to change its view of private financial institutions. Letting the financial sector engage in business as usual and having the government pretend it can insure us against real losses won't do the trick. People need to have a reason to park their money anywhere near people who, it's now clear, have been selling fake securities for years and have no intention of telling their investors precisely and honestly what they are doing with their money.

Because investors have been burnt so badly, they are more likely, going forward, to be skittish and to quickly sell their financial assets on rumor or small signs of bad news. This spells greater volatility in the financial
